President 2012

Open Heart, Open Hand
February is a time for giving gifts to our sweethearts, but I want to talk to you about another kind of giving, giving from the heart. Your hand and your heart are connected. When you close your hand and your heart to giving, whether it is money, time or compassion, you also close your hand and your heart to receiving. No one can put anything into a closed fist. But when you open your hand and let go of a few things, your hand is open to receive much more in return, and your heart likewise. Make an effort this month to have an open hand and an open heart. If you see a need, fill it. Then expect good things to come your way.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The original version of the Pledge of Allegiance was first published in the September 8, 1892 issue of the "Youth's Companion," a weekly magazine then published in Boston. Claims of authorship have been made on behalf of both James B. Upham, an executive editor of the "Youth's Companion," and Francis Bellamy, an assistant editor of the magazine. In 1957, the Library of Congress issued a report that concluded that Bellamy's claim to authorship was upon more solid ground.

The phrase "my flag" contained in the original pledge was changed 30 years later to "flag of the United States of America." The pledge was not officially recognized by the United States until June 22, 1942, when the 77th Congress issued a joint resolution of the Senate and the House of Representatives on Flag Etiquette under Public Law 829. Included in the law was the Pledge of Allegiance with instructions on its use. On June 14, 1954, the words "under God" were added by an Act of Congress. Please note: the phrase "one nation under God" does not contain a comma and should be recited without a pause after "nation."

Our flag stands today as a unifying emblem for Americans who believe that its red for bravery, its white for purity, and its blue for loyalty will help us to keep working toward peace among nations and liberty and justice for all.

Obama's Racial Politics By Walter E. Williams 2/1/2012

There's been a heap of criticism placed upon President Barack Obama's domestic policies that have promoted government intrusion and prolonged our fiscal crisis and his foreign policies that have emboldened our enemies. Any criticism of Obama pales in comparison with what might be said about the American people who voted him in to the nation's highest office. Obama's presidency represents the first time in our history that a person could have been elected to that office who had long-standing close associations with people who hate our nation. I'm speaking of the Rev. Jeremiah Wright, Obama's pastor for 20 years, who preached that blacks should sing not "God Bless America," but "God damn America." Then there's 2001 terrorist attack, "I don't regret setting bombs. ... I feel we didn't do enough." Obama has served on a foundation board, appeared on panels, and even held campaign events in Ayers' home, joined by Ayers' former-fugitive wife, Bernardine Dohrn. Bill Ayers' close association with Obama is reflected by his admission that he helped write Obama's memoirs, "Dreams from My Father." Many Americans thought that with Obama's presidency, we were moving to a "post-racial society." Little can be further from the truth. Victor Davis Hanson, senior fellow at William Ayers, now professor of education at the University of Illinois at Chicago but formerly a member of the Weather Underground, an anti-U.S. group that bombed the Pentagon, U.S. Capitol and other government buildings. Although Ayers was never convicted of any crime, he told a New York Times reporter, in the wake of the September the Hoover Institution, in a National Review (1/18/2012) article titled "Obama's Racial Politics," says that Obama's message about race and his charges of racial bigotry are "usually coded and subtle." Criticizing Republicans, before a Mexican-American audience, Obama said that he ran for office because "America should be a place where you can always make it if you try -- a place where every child, no matter what they look like (or) where they come from, should have a chance to succeed." If you don't get it, "no matter what they look like" is code for nonwhite. Hanson says that Obama's attorney general, Eric Holder, has "found race a convenient refuge from criticism -- most recently accusing his congressional auditors of racism, for their grilling him over government sales of firearms to Mexican cartel hit men."

Obama's racial politics are aided and abetted by a dishonest news media. When Republican candidate Texas Gov. Rick Perry referred to "a big black cloud that hangs over America, that debt that is so monstrous," he was dishonestly accused of racism by MSNBC's Ed Schultz, who said, "That black cloud Perry is talking about is President Barack Obama." Schultz omitted the second half of Perry's quote. Chris Matthews referred to Perry's vision of federalism as "Bull Connor with a smile."

The media have help from black congressmen in stirring up racial dissent. Rep. Emanuel Cleaver, D-Mo., said white presidents must be "pushed a great deal more" to address black unemployment than would a black president. Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee, D-Texas, said that argument over the debt ceiling is proof of racial animosity toward Obama. Rep. Barbara Lee, D-Calif., said that Republicans are trying to deny blacks the vote. Rep. Andre Carson, D-Ind., said the tea party wishes to lynch blacks and hang them from trees. Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., said Perry's job creation in Texas is "one stage away from slavery." All of this places a heavy burden on people who care about our nation. We must ensure that the 2012 elections are the most open and honest elections in U.S. history. Should Obama lose, I wouldn't put it past leftists, progressives, the news media and their race-hustling allies, as well as the president, to fan the fires of hate and dissension by charging that racists somehow stole the election, thereby giving support and excuses for the kind of violence and lawlessness that we've witnessed in flash mobs and Occupy Wall Street riots.
